7Q: Unable to compile binary after upgrading the NDK in a cross-compiler I use this tutorial to build cross-compiler for Android ( Everything worked ok, when I first built the project, but when I wanted to upgrade the version of NDK to 20b (I've been using 19b), the installation of the build tools didn't finish. Now I can't even compile my app, because I get this error: error: undefined reference to 'log' The only thing that I can think is that it's because the linker can't find the header files, but I've already built this part of the process once, and everything was ok. What can be happening? A: Building the cross-compiler usually is a two-step process. The first step is to build the toolchain for the target you're using, in this case, you're building for Android. In that process, you install whatever tools are needed to build your app. The second step is to build a new toolchain that can be used to build your app. Since you built the toolchain once, it is possible that you don't need to build a new toolchain and the second step was skipped. If that's the case, you need to build a toolchain for Android. In a cross-compiler, the toolchain is not built from source, but from a binary in the /cross-tools directory. To rebuild this toolchain, run make cross-toolchain-bin.

Then just run make. If you don't have the Android tools installed already, you'll need to install them. Once that's done, make should work fine. Human Trafficking: A Plague That We Must Recognize and Combat Human Trafficking is a pervasive social issue, affecting both young and old. In the United States, the U.S. Department of Justice estimates that there are approximately 400,000 people involved in human trafficking in the U.S. Such is the horrible reality of the human trafficking epidemic. Yet, due to its cultural and societal stigma, the story of human trafficking remains in the shadows. Although there are many misconceptions and unrealistic misconceptions about human trafficking, there is evidence to suggest that human 82157476af
